

Stop Wasting Taxpayer Money in the Tongass

America's hunters and anglers have cherished wild Alaskan places as a birthright since Theodore Roosevelt and Jack London. We still do.

It's flat wrong for taxpayers to pay for the destruction of remaining unprotected stands of Tongass old growth forest at a loss to the U.S. Treasury.

Sportsmen and women have the most to lose from fiscally irresponsible timber road subsidies. We visit the Tongass in growing numbers annually because much of it remains wild, with abundant fish and wildlife including bears, salmon, moose and waterfowl.

The magnificent, unroaded areas of the Tongass are wildlife strongholds and shouldn't be diminished at taxpayer expense.
